at Eighth Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street, where he had worked for twenty years.

It wasn't that Zuschner could not find jobs in other drug stores. He could and did, and worked at them several times since Proprietor Kinsman turned him off eight months ago. But never would he stay in another place longer than necessary to put him in funds. Then he would quit and hurry back to his ancient corner, and hang around there night and day, pleading and waiting for the old job back.

job back.
It was this way with Herman Zuschner. When they built that building at the corner of Eighth Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street and turned its first floor into a wee apothecary shop, Zuschner was the first and only clerk. That was many years ago, for Zusch-ner, who was nearly sixty when he killed himself, was only a fiedgling

He pounded away with pestle and mortar on the little prescription bench very contentedly, and he was still pounding and reaching up for queer-lettered bottles, just as contentedly half a decade later when the Kinsmans made a real drugstore out of the place. At the drugstore on Sunday the clerks

At the drugstore on Sunday the clerks said they doubted it in all the years he had worked there Zuschner left the neighborhood more than a dozen times. He even lived within a block of the corner—in a little room on the top floor of Ford's Hotel, 273 West Fortleth Street. A witty young clerk one day called him "Old Vicinity." The nickname clung and Zuschner answered to it with a sort of pride. Eight months ago the boss of the drugstore told "Old Vicinity" that they couldn't use him any longer there-that he was discharged and would be Zuschner dropped the pestle mortar and stared in piteous astonishmortar and stared in piecous aconsen-ment. It had never even occurred to him that some day he must leave. "But I haven't done anything wrong," he pleaded through his tears. "I'l naven't made any mistakes, have 17 And I've always been to work on

"Sure, you're a good man, Zusch-ner," said the boss. "There's no com-plaint against you. But we got to have new blood in the store, see-younger men with the latest wrinkles."
"But I've worked here all my life," said Zuschner, "You haven't got the heart to turn me out after working here so many years. Why, I couldn't work anywhere else. I'd rather die first." first."

But it did "Old Vicinity" no good to offer himself back at reduced wages. The decree was final. He had to go. He went, but for the next three months he hung around the drugstore corner, loaing there, with nothing to do, and with his small savings draining rapidly away. When they were gone a drug-

Sunday afternoon the maid wha makes up the room in Ford's Hotel, where Zuschner used to sleep, found the door locked and the key turned crosswise on the inside of the lock. She rapped and rapped and got no answer, and then called the clerk, who broke down the door and found the old apothecary stretched out dead in bed, with an empty bottle of cyanide of potassium in his hand.
